Programming Design

The Enchanted Pen is a fictional fantasy writers' conference set in Hocking Hills, Ohio, built as a group branding and programming project. My role was programming lead, which meant I was making real logistical decisions that the design had to support.

I developed the full conference schedule in both a short-form and long-form version, each built in InDesign with a focus on type hierarchy and readability. A schedule puts a lot of pressure on its typography. Attendees need to scan it quickly and trust what they find. I also wrote all the event copy myself, so voice and clarity were just as much a part of the process as layout.

Beyond the schedules, I designed attendee badges in Photoshop and social media assets in Illustrator. Keeping a visual system consistent across formats is something I try to be deliberate about, since a schedule and a badge live in pretty different contexts but still need to feel like they belong together.

Survey Poster

This was a freelance project for a student in NMU's Earth, Environmental, and Geographical Sciences department, supporting research on returning passenger rail service to the Upper Peninsula. The goal was simple: get people to stop and fill out a survey. That meant the poster had to earn attention fast.

I drew on vintage transit poster design as a visual reference, leaning into bold type and sleek, simple shapes to give the piece some personality and weight. Typography was doing most of the heavy lifting here, so I made sure the hierarchy guided the eyes in the right order. The train itself was also a priority. I worked closely with the student to make sure the railcar design and livery were accurate, since this was tied to legitimate academic research and the details mattered.

This project was a good reminder that even a single design has a lot of decisions packed into it, and that working with a client means understanding what they actually need the work to do, not just what looks good.

Brochure Redesign

This project started with a real brochure from the NMU Department of Music and a simple question: how do you make this more compelling? For a PR message design class, I took the existing piece and rebuilt it with a focus on visual interest and clearer communication.

The content itself needed work too. I rewrote and updated the copy in AP style, making sure the information was accurate and easy to read at a glance. That meant thinking about the brochure not just as a design object but as a message with a specific audience and purpose: prospective students who needed to understand what singing at NMU actually looks like.

The design had to follow NMU's "Always North" brand system, which is a new identity framework with detailed documentation. I read through the guidelines carefully and applied the graphic styles throughout, which was good practice in working within an established system rather than building from scratch.

Multi Format Print

Each semester, the Students' Art Gallery creates a season schedule that lives across campus and social media all semester long. This is one of the many versions of this poster I made, specifically for the Fall 2024 semester.

I wanted it to feel like it came from a real print process, rather than digital. I was inspired by risograph printing, specifically for its layered colors, slight variations, and tactile quality. I leaned into that aesthetic intentionally, adding fake registration marks and color palette references as visual details that reward a closer look. It gives the piece an “in production” aesthetic without actually running it through a riso machine.

Because this poster needed to work at multiple print sizes and as a digital file, I paid close attention to file format, compression, and export settings to make sure what I handed off to the printing department was as compatible and clean as possible.

Poster Design

This one went from a digital illustration to a physical print run. I designed the concert poster for Superior A Cappella's winter concert, and then screen printed over 75 copies myself using a photo emulsion screen printing process with two custom colors.

I was immediately aware that designing for screen print means making decisions you can't undo once you're in production. I worked through halftone patterns, dithering, negative space, and registration issues carefully to make sure the image would hold up at print scale and read clearly with only two colors. The illustration started in Procreate and was finished in Photoshop, with the whole time thinking about how the art would translate to ink on paper rather than pixels on a screen.

To keep the visual system cohesive, I extended the same style into the concert program and social media graphics. Pulling one aesthetic across multiple formats is something I try to be deliberate about, and having a tight deadline with a real event date made every decision feel a little more serious.

Full Lockup

The full lockup is the preferred configuration of the Aegis logo. It consists of the logomark positioned to the left of the wordmark, aligned on a horizontal axis. This lockup should be used as the default across all brand applications: marketing materials, presentations, documents, signage, and digital platforms.

A centered stacked variant (logomark above wordmark) is available for square formats and applications where a horizontal layout is not practical.

The full lockup should always be used as a single, unified asset. Never separate the logomark from the wordmark within the lockup, and never substitute one element with a redrawn or re-typeset version.
